>The moment the door of the car opens, Hinata stumbles out, legs trembling, takes off his helmet and gloves, tosses them somewhere to be picked up later and collapses on the ground, limbs spread out and eyes wide.

"Holy shit," he breathes, "that was incredible."

"Of course it was. I told you to just trust me, didn't I? Daichi-san said that we'd be able to do great things if we just worked together. Besides, if we're ever going to be allowed to get out onto the track, we're going to have to work together." Hinata looks up at the source of the voice and beams as Kageyama sits down next to him.

"Yeah, no kidding. Those were some of the best few laps of my life! I could have gone 'round and 'round the circuit forever! It's never been that thrilling to be behind the wheel before, Kageyama! I mean like, did you hear the engine when I started off? She was all like 'Gwaaah!' and I was all like 'Waaaaaaaaaah!' and then- and then-"

"Yeah, yeah, I get it, you dumbass; you like car racing." Before the orange-haired boy can interject with how just saying '_like_' didn't do his passion any justice, Kageyama rolled his eyes and continued.

"That's why I have a small preposition." Hinata's eagerness shows and he's still so obviously high on adrenaline so the dark-haired boy takes this as a good sign and continues.

"Stick with me here at Karasuno. You're a racer, I'm a mechanic. Race in the cars I work on and I'll keep you on the track for as long as possible."

The sharp gleam in Hinata's eyes and the excitement of watching someone finally -_finally_- racing with the engines he had _oh _so carefully tinkered with and understanding and making use of the all the parts in the way Kageyama had hoped they would be used spurred him on.

"And remember, as long I'm here, you're invincible!"
